

To whom this may concern:

I am writing with regards to the consideration of the repeal of some states rights on Telephone Privacy. I believe the current laws which reside at the state level are more appropriate than national standards at the FCC level.

State law protects those services which a "state" must provide it's citizens. These privacy rules protect us from an unforgiving body of business people who would do anything to "Get" to us.

To me it's as if the water company required that you read an ad for every 10 gallons of water used.

The FCC is a rule making body, where as a state sets laws. Those who call homes care not for the rules, it's obvious in the manner in which they change tactics as people catch on.